

About me

Hello, I'm Bijaya Thapa, a computer enthusiast who is currently honing my Data Science talents at Broadway Infosys. I have a BCA from Tribhuvan University. Currently live in Balaju Heights, Kathmandu, originally from Bharatpur. Technology has always informed me about how it functions and how it shapes our surroundings. My passion lies at the intersection of sports and technology. I'm focused on learning how data-driven insights can improve tactical decisions, player performance, and team strategies. My goal is to become a modern football coach who combines field knowledge with the power of analytics. In places like Europe, clubs already rely on data analysts as part of the coaching team – and that's just starting to pick up in South Asia. I can see the connection between these two fields, recognizing that modern football requires a blend of traditional coaching knowledge and cutting-edge data analytics. I want to bridge the gap between the virtual and physical worlds, seeing how data can be used to make on-the-field tactics more effective.

A secret that I don't want to keep anymore

Back in 12th standard, I got into a situation that I've kept hidden for a long time – partly out of fear, partly out of shame. But I think it's time to let it out. One evening, I was riding a bike – without a driving license. It wasn't something I thought much about at the time; lots of people around me did it, and I figured I was careful enough. But then, out of nowhere, a drunk man suddenly walked right into my path. I couldn't react fast enough. Thankfully, it didn't result in a serious accident, but the police were involved, and I was taken into custody. I can still remember the feeling – the fear, the regret, and the realization that a split-second moment can change everything. Since then, I've carried that incident quietly. Not many people know. But it taught me something real: that responsibility isn't about getting away with things – it's about understanding the weight of your actions before something forces you to. I'm not proud of what happened, but I've grown from it. And it's a part of my story I no longer want to hide.
